

Addition to "The explosion..."

Was there really an explosion in God perhaps trillions of light years ago measured in earth's time? And was that how we came to be? Who can possibly say for sure? Deep thinkers have often felt that creation began with a bang, and that we are what's left.

I personally will keep that one, until something better is presented to me. I am certain of one thing. I am an extension of that which created me. I may never be one hundred percent certain of all the ramifications of how it all began but I do know that everything that is, is a manifestation of the only one in existence.

There is one life eternal and it is manifested in creation, and is appearing as that. I believe that every true master that ever walked this earth knew this. Jesus Christ certainly was clear about who he was. How clear are we? I ask myself the question... Is there anything amiss in all of Gods creation?

The only answer that can ever be is not a chance! How could perfection spawn imperfection? Not a chance! My sound mind says not a chance! The only imperfection is my perspective and if I look a little deeper I see that the imperfection of my perspective was planned, so this means that my imperfection is not an accident{ there are no such things} which brings me back to a perfect universe and a perfect creation.
